OBJECTIVES

By the end of the program, participants will be able to:

- Demonstrate their knowledge of the history of midwifery, science and medicine in the early modern period.
- Discuss research methods, sources, and results related to the history of midwifery, science and medicine in the early modern period.
- Discuss and develop a wider critical perspective on the history of midwifery, science and medicine in the early modern period that can help inform their perspectives on issues related to practice and relevant public debates.

PRESENTER

Dr. Margaret Carlyle, Ph.D., University of Chicago. Dr. Carlyle's research focuses on the production of scientific, medical and technological knowledge in 18th-century France and its colonies, including the transformation of midwifery by female midwives and male surgeons.
